Not illustrated. 1892 Excerpt: .and that the fire must have been smouldering some time to have broken out as fiercely as H seemed to have done at this place. The Court, however, was unable to accept this theory, in the face of the evidence of Dawson and Lcary, and to the fact that no sign of smouldering or smell of fire had been perceived before 1.15 p.m. on that day. The nose was brought down on to the fidley grating, and the master endeavoured to direct a stream of water through the aperture, but owing to the funnel he was unable to get near enough to use the hose with any effect. He then ran up on deck to alter the ship s course, so as to put her before the wind and reduce the draught, and communicated with the Spree, belonging to the North German Lloyd Line, which was fortunately in sight, asking her to stand by him. An attempt was then made to cut through the main deek above the seat of the fire: but, on removing the planking, they came to an iron deck and gave up the attempt. Another attempt was made to gain access to the fire by the disused staircase already mentioned, but the smoke had gained access to this, and when the trapdoor in the main deck was opened it was found impossible to descend the staircase. S.on afterwards the engineers were driven out of the engine-room by the smoke, and as it...
